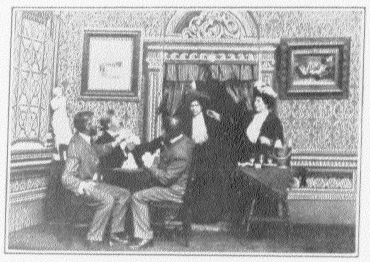
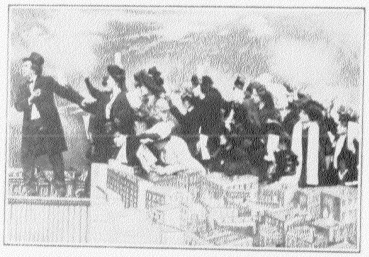
Bachelor's Wedding Bells.

LENGTH, 485 FEET. PRICE, $53.35.





Mr. Barker, a confirmed bachelor, club man, all around good fellow, has an antipathy to the female sex. He likes them at arm's length—"but no wedding bells for him."

Several married friends invite him to their homes, and after seeing the stormy side of matrimony he congratulates himself on a life of single blessedness. One evening at his club, some of the members and their wives concoct a plan to have some fun at his expense, they insert an "ad." in a paper for "A charming lady, object matrimony," giving Barker's address as the meeting place. The consequence is Barker finds himself besieged by ardent females who make his life a pandemonium for a few hours. One lady of more determination than the rest succeeds in capturing him. Barker confesses himself conquered and yields to his captor who smothers him with kisses.

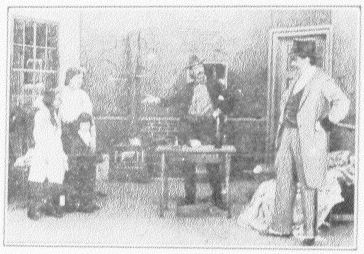
THE RINGMASTER'S WIFE.

LENGTH, 835 FEET.



A young doctor pays marked attention to the daughter of a Country minister. He has a rival, a sinister character. The doctor is loved by another girl. When repudiating the undesired attention of his rival, a fight ensues. The doctor punishes his rival severely. The latter vows vengeance.

Under the Christmas tree. Engagement of the doctor with the minister's daughter. The rival lover together with the girl who loves the doctor plot to ruin the doctor. They tell the minister a story which the father believes and orders the doctor from the house. Six months later. The rival elopes with the minister's daughter.

Ten years later. Two children have been born to the couple who have been driven into the poorest tenements. A circus Manager engages the family, husband as ringmaster, wife and children as performers.

Weak from lack of nourishment and maltreatment by her husband, the wife looses her balance on the high trapeze and falls to the ground. A doctor is summoned. He appears to be the former lover of the unhappy wife. Husband enters, orders the doctor to leave, which the latter refuses to do. The husband tries to punish the doctor but is punished in return. Wild with rage he starts to whip his helpless wife when the oldest child takes the pistol and kills her father.

The doctor brings the luckless woman and her children home to her parents where she is forgiven. Her rival tells of the plot between her and the ringmaster to ruin the doctor. The minister recognizes the wrong he did the doctor and not long after the lovers are reunited.
